Threshold for Reporting

Imagine that you encountered a child who has an injury (or condition) that might have been caused by abuse AND you have gathered as much information as you feel is possible, given the sources readily available.

Q: How great would the likelihood of abuse have to be for you to feel you had reasonable suspicion that the child's injury or condition was caused by abuse?

What counts as reasonable suspicion?

Challenges

- Child abuse can be difficult to detect
- People receive little training re. abuse
- Huge variation among mandated reporters
- Need to avoid both under- & over- reporting
- Conflicting obligations (children, employers, clients)

Olivia (Age 4)

Olivia began coming to Megan's child care program several months before her (now 4 month-old) baby sister, Ruby, was born. Their father, who grew up around here and moved out of town after he graduated high school, moved back to town just over 5 years ago with his then-pregnant, girlfriend. Olivia and Ruby's father can be a little gruff at times but is generally outgoing and friendly. Olivia and Ruby's mom usually keeps to herself and doesn't seem to have developed close relationships with any of the other parents or staff members—despite the fact that she's usually the one who both drops off and picks up Olivia and Ruby. Though there have never been any "incidents" involving this family, they often seem stressed.

Calling ChildLine

WHAT WILL IT BE LIKE WHEN I CALL CHILDLINE?

If you've never called ChildLine, it can feel like a big deal.

Maybe you're not sure if you have enough information. Or, maybe you have a lot of feelings about reporting a family you work with. The good news? Trained, experienced staff on the other end of the phone are there to help you.

When you call, ChildLine staff will help walk you through the process of reporting, including questions outlined here. You may also report online by visiting the Pennsylvania Child Welfare Portal.

Select each flip card to learn more about what to expect when calling ChildLine, and remember the "Be Prepared" handout and worksheet will help you when making a report.

May is Children's Mental Health Awareness Month – and Early Childhood Educators Make a Difference!

Early childhood educators are not just teaching ABCs—they're building the foundation for lifelong mental wellness. This month, celebrate early childhood educators and their incredible roles in helping Pennsylvania's youngest learners grow strong, confident, and resilient.

Pennsylvania's Infant and Early Childhood Mental Health (IECMH) Consultation is a free resource that supports children's social-emotional development from birth through age five within early learning programs participating in Keystone STARS. Learn more about this program and how it can help early childhood educators, children, and their families. Also available are virtual trainings, Early Childhood Mental Health Matters Handouts, and more. Sign up to receive the monthly Bright Start, Bright Kids, Bright Future newsletter, and browse past releases. Share this resource from PA's Promise for Children with families: Supporting Children's Mental Health: A Family's Guide to Nurturing Well-Being.

By nurturing safe, supportive spaces, recognizing emotional needs, and showing children and their families, they matter, early childhood educators are helping shape healthier futures—one high-five, one kind word, one hug at a time.
